

It is time for all good folk to gather 'round the holiday onion and have a good cry – a peculiar tradition that began during the great pandemic of 2020-2021.

Though exact origins are unknown, historians point to the hoarding of basic supplies during those troubled times. The theory is that when surplus onions began to sprout, coupled with strict shelter-in-place warnings over the holidays which made it difficult to secure the usual holiday decorations, people simply made do.

It is time for all good folk to gather 'round the holiday onion and have a good cry – a peculiar tradition that began during the great pandemic of 2020-2021.

Though exact origins are unknown, historians point to the hoarding of basic supplies during those troubled times. The theory is that when surplus onions began to sprout, coupled with strict shelter-in-place warnings over the holidays which made it difficult to secure the usual holiday decorations, people simply made do.

It is time for all good folk to gather 'round the holiday onion and have a good cry – a peculiar tradition that began during the great pandemic of 2020-2021.

Though exact origins are unknown, historians point to the hoarding of basic supplies during those troubled times. The theory is that when surplus onions began to sprout, coupled with strict shelter-in-place warnings over the holidays which made it difficult to secure the usual holiday decorations, people simply made do.

It is time for all good folk to gather 'round the holiday onion and have a good cry – a peculiar tradition that began during the great pandemic of 2020-2021.

Though exact origins are unknown, historians point to the hoarding of basic supplies during those troubled times. The theory is that when surplus onions began to sprout, coupled with strict shelter-in-place warnings over the holidays which made it difficult to secure the usual holiday decorations, people simply made do.